

TB

TB is an illness of the lungs. It spreads through the air when a person with TB coughs. TB can be cured if you take all your medicine.

For community members

Key messages

- A cough that lasts two weeks or more is a reason to be tested.
- Go to the health centre for a test. Do not wait.
- Take your medicine every day until the health worker says you are finished. This usually takes about six months. If you stop early, the TB can come back and be harder to treat.
- Cover your mouth when you cough and keep rooms airy.
- People who live with someone with TB should be checked too, especially children.

- TB can be a danger for pregnant women and their babies. Pregnant women are tested at antenatal care.

Get tested if you have

- A cough for two weeks or more
- Coughing up blood
- Chest pain
- Fever or night sweats
- Losing weight without trying
- Feeling very tired

General information only. Follow the advice of your health centre and current national guidelines.